

Symbolism

Many people consider the painting to the left to be the best example of Symbolism in painting. The Scream by Edvard Munch shows us how frustrated the artist is on the inside. Like Munch, many artists during the late 1800s were feeling frustrated with society. They were unhappy with changes caused by the industrial revolution. They felt there was too much poverty and there were too few people with great wealth and power. They also didn't like the pollution new factories were causing. Symbolists used painting as an outlet<sup>1</sup> for their anger.

This anger was not well accepted by society. People frowned on symbolist works. Many artists who embraced this medium were forced to go underground.<sup>2</sup> They stayed away from people who didn't agree with their views and formed their own art groups. Symbolists also held their own shows to exhibit their work.

Although their work was born in anger, many people believe symbolism is an important art movement. To express their feelings, Symbolist painters distorted<sup>3</sup> figures. They also used line and color as never before. With these tools they made emotions like fear and jealousy scream out at the viewer.

<sup>3</sup> distorted – so badly formed or out of shape as to be ugly
